Accounts before 1730

Introduction: Suitably, Franklin’s first extant account is with the Boston bookseller John Phillips, for we know that the book-loving Franklin bought and read incessantly when he was a boy and young man and that the only good bookstores in the colonies at the time were in Boston. It nevertheless seems surprising that he spent the large sum of three pounds and three shillings when he was relatively impecunious. The next accounts are with Thomas Denham (d. 1728), the Quaker merchant and substitute father with whom Franklin returned from England in 1726.

The surviving 1729 accounts are mainly from the back of Ledger A&B, entered under the names of the debtors and creditors. They were probably copied from a previous daybook which does not survive. I have entered them chronologically under the date recorded with the account. Unfortunately, many of these accounts were simply dated "1729" and so are entered at the year-end. Most bills are for the forms that Franklin and Meredith printed or for advertisements, especially in the Pennsylvania Gazette (PG), which the partners bought on 25 September 1729.

Franklin’s Junto friend Nicholas Scull, now a deputy sheriff, seems to have been his best customer in 1729. Isaac Decow, of Burlington, New Jersey, who predicted Franklin’s future success, also turns up. Simon Edgell, the pewterer and merchant from whom Franklin rented the house at 139 Market Street (1728-1738), was an early customer. The merchant William Rawle (d. 1741), who later became a member of the Library Company and the Union Fire Company, advertised several times in the PG. The wealthy merchant and later mayor of Philadelphia, Edward Shippen, also did business on credit with the partners.

Franklin and Meredith set up a small stationery shop by 1729. Besides paper, they no doubt carried ink, and the materials to make ink (oil and lampblack), and a few of the most common books, like hornbooks, spellers, and bibles. Joseph Growden bought six almanacs (15 Dec); William Mogridge bought a pint of oil (15 Dec); and William Jones bought 19 reams of paper (1729). A few entries reveal the goods and services the partners took in barter. William Jones exchanged work for a series of items, extending at least to 20 Dec 1730. Jones, therefore, seems to be the first person to work for Franklin and Meredith.

Imprints. In 1728, two job printings are mentioned: a brief “account of Pennsylvania” which Edward Farmer paid for, and a large number of deputations printed for the lawyer and innkeeper ("the Indian King in Market Street") Owen Owen.

There are no records in Franklin’s accounts concerning the partners’s first recorded printing, William Sewall’s History of the Quakers (1728; Miller 1), nor of their first paper currency printing, the Delaware £12,000 printing of 1729 (Miller 3). Franklin printed his own Modest Inquiry into the Nature and Necessity of a Paper Currency (Miller 4) early in April, 1729, and sold it for 6 pence (see Life 1:398, fig.28). As a political pamphlet on a currently controversial topic, it was probably popular, but no indication of a second edition exists. The partners probably kept the print standing for a few weeks and printed more from the same type. Franklin had sufficient copies left two years later to send a dozen to his brother James (30 Oct 1731).

Almanacs were a staple of every printer’s business from November through January. Franklin evidently proposed to Thomas Godfrey, his Junto friend who was sub-leasing part of 139 Market Street, that the mathematician compile an almanac, which the partners would print. It went on sale in October (Miller 5). The partners and Godfrey thought that Isaac Watts’s Psalms (Miller 2) would sell well, but it did not. The pedlar Adams took a copy on 21 Nov 1730. The following year, 28 October 1731, Franklin’s former Boston schoolteacher George Brownell bought two dozen. Two days later, 30 October 1731, Franklin sent 100 copies to his brother
James. And on the same date he sent 36 copies unbound (Miller 2 mistakenly says 40 copies) and another dozen (bound?) to his South Carolina partner Thomas Whitemarsh. Probably John Meredith paid the partners to print his Short Discourse Proving the Jewish Sabbath is repealed (Miller 7), though Franklin also sold the pamphlet. The almanac maker John Jerman purchased one on 11 August 1730, and Franklin sent 24 copies to his brother James on 30 October 1731.

1724 Chronology [Calendar 11]:

No information on the rate of exchange in McCusker, though in 1725, £139.34 Pa currency was worth £100 sterling; McCusker 184.

5 May, Tuesday. BF’s note of payment to the bookseller John Phillips. Dated “Boston May 5th 1724,” for 3.3.0. PHS; printed, P 1:53. Though the Papers editors were uncertain of the date “5” in “5 May,” I have examined the original at PHS and 5 May is correct. Both the old nineteenth-century catalogue card at PHS and the facsimile of the document published in 1899 confirm 5 May. PMHB 23 (1899): 396. Life 1:248, fig. 20.
