Agricultural Hall, the seat of the School of Agriculture.

Of all the pursuits and professions of mankind, agriculture is the oldest and must always be the most important. Nevertheless, few major industries have been so affected by the development of modern technology. The modern farmer or agribusinessman, if he is to succeed, must bring to his work much knowledge and many skills.

The growing of food is but one of the many professional goals of agricultural study and research. The broad field of agribusiness extends throughout society and provides vocations in various occupations and services.

The objective of the School of Agriculture is to prepare students for this great variety of career opportunities in individual enterprise, teaching, and public service. The curricula are planned to give the student (1) direct contact with the agricultural science, (2) fundamental training in basic sciences, and (3) a broad, general educational experience. The curricula provide a flexible program of study designed to keep the student up to date on the rapid changes and improvements that are taking place in agriculture.

As an integral part of a land-grant university, the School of Agriculture plays a unique role. It serves not only those who are formally enrolled as college students on the Newark campus, but in addition, it serves all the people of the State through experiment stations at Newark and Georgetown, the Cooperative Extension Service with programs in agriculture, home economics, and 4-H club work in each of the Counties, as well as the Division of Short Courses. Indeed, an increasing number of the State's urban and suburban citizens are demanding and receiving services from a competent staff which, until the recent past, was dedicated to serving mainly the citizens of rural Delaware.

It has often been said that education helps the student to grow in personal understanding and self-mastery, to develop wider and deeper appreciations, to acquire enthusiasm for hard work, to delight in the persistent pursuit of knowledge, and to become fair and open-minded.

If this be true, or even acceptable in theory, the student must recognize early in his college career that the broad purpose of education is not merely the accumulation of facts but more importantly the development of the power to think clearly and well. For students thinking soon reject passive acceptance of information and actively draw on the wealth of knowledge their instructors hold in reserve.

Thus students as well as instructors retain at all times the happy privilege of turning average days into exciting ones, but neither can do it alone.

school of business and economics

The expansion of the American economy, the growth of foreign competition and the introduction of mathematical tools and social science concepts into business management have created a great demand for young people specifically trained for careers in business, economics, and accounting.

The University of Delaware keeps pace with this demand and prepares the students to start their careers in management, government service, or the practice of accounting. The breadth of the four-year programs also provides a foundation for the student who intends to take graduate training in Business, Accounting, Economics, or related areas.

An undergraduate major in the School of Business and Economics offers many unique attractions to the serious student. Students have the advantages of a small school, such as close personal contact with the faculty, while also enjoying the diversity of faculty, programs and facilities associated with a comprehensive University.

The school is a member of the Middle Atlantic Association of Colleges of Business Administration and all of its offerings are accredited by the Middle States Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools. The accounting offerings registered in New York approximates a national accreditation for the accounting curriculum.

Just as the whole enterprise of education is a function of a society, so the function of teacher education is a responsibility of a total university. This is why at the University of Delaware teacher education is an all-University function. Knowledge of specialized subject matter is of equal importance with human growth and development, the psychology of learning, the mastery of techniques, and a sound philosophy of education.

It is also our position that learning is not a discrete, intellectual process but a part of the total growth and development of the person, socially, culturally, and emotionally. We believe that the American school, although in many respects resembling schools in other societies, is fundamentally a product of American society and has helped to make American society what it is today.

Our concept of teaching method is a relatively broad one, since we see it as including all those materials and approaches which can be used by the teacher to stimulate and guide learning activities.

Perhaps the best way to characterize the philosophy of the School of Education is to say that we are eclectic, not doctrinaire, and are neither seduced by the glamour of new ideas nor unwilling to challenge traditions. And our emphasis, as is true of that of the University of Delaware as a whole, is on quality rather than quantity.

school of engineering It is the purpose of the School of Engineering to help its students take full advantage of the excellent opportunities that exist in the University for a rich and rewarding education. Under faculty direction students prepare for careers of leadership in science, industry, and government service. Strong emphasis is placed upon the fundamentals of mathematics and science and cultural subjects. Upon the completion of four years of study students may elect employment in the areas of chemical, civil, electrical or mechanical engineering or choose graduate study.

The unsurpassed laboratory facilities, the low ratio of students to faculty and the opportunity to study under people, who are actively engaged in research and professional activities, all reflect the benefits of a location, where significant technological progress is being made and the guidance of industrial leaders is freely given.

Alison Hall, the landmark for our Home Economics Department.

The School of Home Economics educates women for professional careers in home economics. The curriculum provides a general education that is concerned with the psychological, sociological, aesthetic, and economic forces affecting the family. Home economics students take courses in the natural and biological sciences, the social sciences, art and the humanities. In addition to a core of basic home economics courses, each student selects an area of specialization that will prepare her for the professional career of her choice. These include: Child Development, Food and Nutrition, Textiles and Clothing and Home Economics Education.

The School of Home Economics is housed in Alison Hall where laboratories and classroom facilities represent the latest trends in equipment and furnishing essential for the specialized type of instruction offered. A nursery school for pre-school children provides opportunity for students to observe and study the mental, physical, and emotional development of children.

Upon graduation home economics students are employed in a variety of positions. Some of these include journalism, merchandising, television, research, dietitics, teaching, and working with preschool children.
