A replica of the acclaimed "Fearless Girl" statue – and the Delaware artist who created it – made an appearance in Newark for a female empowerment event on Saturday.

The Fearless 5K, which was a fundraiser for Mid-Atlantic Ballet, drew 150 participants, many of them young girls. After the run, the participants gathered for an after-party at the Deer Park Tavern, where they heard from sculptor Kristen Visbal and posed for photos with the statue.

Nietubicz looks to bring his government experience to council

By JOSH SHANNON
jshannon@chespub.com

Ricky Nietubicz spent four years working for the city of Newark and now, after moving on to the private sector, he is looking to serve Newark in a different way — as a councilman.

If he is able to unseat District 3 incumbent Jen Wallace in Tuesday's election, it would mark a rare move from city employee to elected official in Newark. However, it's one for which Nietubicz believes he is well-suited.

"I have a really unique skill set and knowledge base to bring to the table," the 31-year-old Newark Preserve resident said.

A native of Ellicott City, Md., Nietubicz moved to Newark to attend the University of Delaware, where he earned his undergraduate degree and a master's in public administration. While still a student, he interned with the city's planning department.

After graduation, he spent three years as a full-time employee for the Delaware State Fair before returning to the city to work as a planner in 2012. He was responsible for administering the Downtown Newark Partnership and later became the city's spokesman and community affairs officer.

He left city government in 2016 and now does communication and marketing for Mishimoto Automotive, a New Castle company that makes high-performance car parts.

The former city planner said one of his priorities would be to have council re-examine the city's zoning code, which he said is in need of an update.

"It would be a big undertaking, but it's a worthy exercise," he said.

One area to look at is the number of bedrooms allowed in apartment complexes, he said. While the zoning code restricts the density of units per acre, many developers build four- or six-bedroom units, maximizing the number of students they can pack into the building.

Nietubicz also wants to look at the STC zoning designation that council approved in March 2012 for the University of Delaware's STAR Campus. The code gives UD wide latitude over the development there, and most projects do not require approval from city council as they might in other areas of the city.

"We've seen some great things happen there," he said. "We've seen some things that would be detrimental."

Nietubicz, who as an intern did some of the early research the city used to develop the STC zoning, said UD's plan for the site has changed significantly in the last decade, and the community should have a chance to weigh in on what it wants to see happen there.

"When that zoning was developed, the Chrysler buildings were still there," he said. "Now we have some more information, it's time to look at it. That would be my first priority."

With UD planning to add more than 5,000 students, the ideal scenario would be for the university to build more on-campus housing, he said, though admitting that may not be feasible. He suggested UD look into building housing on a portion of the STAR Campus.

(Nietubicz's wife, Kimberly, works as a senior policy analyst for UD Executive Vice President Alan Brangman. "We both have our day jobs," he said, adding he doesn't believe there will be any conflicts.)

Nietubicz said the city needs to work with developers to ensure projects have the minimum possible impact on the surrounding community. An example, he said, is the recent Park N Shop proposal, which ultimately was tabled by council. While he understands residents' lingering concerns, he praised the developer for working with the community throughout the process.

Nietubicz said he is disappointed city council never voted on the five proposals to build a mixed-use parking structure behind the Main Street Galleria. As part of a public-private partnership, the developers would build the structure and lease the garage portion to the city. One by Lang Development Group would charge no annual fee, just a portion of the revenue collected.

"There's no risk to the taxpayer and no outlay to the taxpayer and taxpayers benefit because there's a revenue stream," he said. "Why would we not do that?"

Nietubicz wants to help improve the relationship between city council and city staff, which at times can be tense.

"Hiring a new city manager is a good chance to hit the reset button," he said.

He also wants to improve communication to residents in his district.

"Right now, the onus is on the resident to take the first step to be informed. Council's duty is to take ownership of informing residents," he said, adding that, if elected, he would regularly mail newsletters to everyone in his district, rather than only those who sign up for an email list.

"I have some ideas of how I could better serve the district," he said.

Newark man charged with third DUI

A Newark man is facing his third DUI charge after being pulled over early Sunday morning.

At around 1:19 a.m., an officer on patrol on Delaware Avenue saw a vehicle driving without headlights and weaving on the road. The officer pulled over the vehicle near the intersection of Academy Street, according to Lt. Fred Nelson, a spokesman for the Newark Police Department.

The driver, Austin T. Roberts, 26, showed signs of impairment, Nelson said. He has two prior arrests for DUI and his license is suspended.

Roberts was charged with third-offense DUI, driving with a suspended license, failure to have insurance in possession and other traffic offenses.

He released after posting $2,700 secured bond.

Controlling development a key issue for Wallace in re-election bid

By JOSH SHANNON

jshannon@chespub.com

When Jen Wallace was elected to city council two years ago, she took her place on the dais next to council members she had often challenged as a frequent attendee of council meetings and leader of the advocacy group Newark Residents Against the Power Plant.

The transition proved to be eye-opening, she said last week.

"I have a better appreciation for the work it takes to be a council person," Wallace said. "It's very easy on the other side of the dais to judge and say they're not doing enough."

On Tuesday, Wallace will seek re-election to the District 3 council seat. Running against her is former city employee Ricky Nietubicz.

Wallace, a 46-year-old resident of Barksdale Estates, works as membership and marketing coordinator for the American Society of Cytopathology and as a freelance writer. She moved to Newark in 2000 and gained prominence in 2013 as a leader in the fight against the data center and power plant that was proposed for the STAR Campus.

In 2016, she ran for the council seat being vacated by Rob Gifford and won a convincing 84 percent of the votes, defeating firefighter Arlynn Hall.

Wallace said the main issue in her district is development, as many residents feel encroached upon by student-focused projects.

"They're surrounded," she said.

That issue was on full display recently as council debated a proposal to replace a vacant building in the Park N Shop with 12 apartments and retail space. Wallace, whose district includes the shopping center, was one of several council members who voiced concerns about the project and ultimately voted to table it so the developer could revise the plans.

"I don't want to say what it would take for me to support it," she said. "What I would hope is we could see units with less bedrooms."

The current plan consists mostly of four-bedroom units that are common among student apartment complexes. Smaller units would be more likely to appeal to tenants other than students, Wallace said.

She acknowledged that with UD planning to expand by more than 5,000 students over the next few years, some development is inevitable. However, she said, it's important to have places for families, seniors and young professionals to live as well.

"Students do need housing, but we need to figure out how to provide housing for everyone else," she said.

Changes need to be made to Newark's comprehensive plan because UD's expansion plans have made the current version out of date, she said.

"We need to go back to the drawing board," she said.

Wallace said she is pleased council has taken steps toward better fiscal responsibility but believes there is still room for improvement.

"We do need more critical thinking about spending and prioritizing," she said, adding the city also needs to find more sustainable funding sources, rather than relying on electric service revenue.

On the long-discussed issue of downtown parking, Wallace said the city still needs more data before making a decision on a big project like a parking garage. She praised the recent installation of signs that show a real-time count of open parking spaces.

"I'm not against a parking garage, but I'm not real crazy about taxpayers paying for a parking garage for the benefit of a small group," she said, adding council should exhaust its options for smaller, less expensive measures first.

Wallace said her proudest accomplishment in her first term was helping promote open government, such as pushing for an earlier start to the budget process and asking the planning department to post proposed development projects online.

"I've worked to bring more transparency to city council," Wallace said. "That's something District 3 is sensitive to in light of recent years. That's gone a long way in restoring trust with residents of the city."

She said her experience over the past two years best qualifies her to serve District 3.

"Now is not the time for a leadership change," she said. "We need people who have been here to choose the next city manager."

She said that while she respects Nietubicz's friendly personality and communication skills, she doesn't believe he has a track record in the district.

"I'm not sure he's shown he has been as involved and engaged as a resident," she said.

Barua looks to find balance on issues facing city

By JOSH SHANNON
jshannon@chespub.com

After growing up in Newark, Neel Barua is running for a chance to serve his community on city council.

"I'm 100-percent local, a Newark native. I know the area. Why not give it a shot?" he said when announcing his candidacy earlier this year. "If you want change, local government is where it happens. Those issues affect you every day."

Barua, 30, faces Jason Lawhorn and Lena Thayer in Tuesday's District 5 election. All three newcomers are seeking to replace three-term incumbent Luke Chapman, who chose not to run again.

Barua grew up in the Abbotsford neighborhood and then moved with his parents to Fairfield, where he still lives. He is a 2006 graduate of Newark High School and earned an associate degree in jazz from the University of Louisville. He is currently pursuing an English degree from the University of Delaware.

He serves as director of operations for his family's business, Glocal Service Partners, a Newark travel agency that specializes in trips based around service projects. He also sells real estate and DJs at a local pizzeria.

He believes his experience in business and with community service – he earned an Eagle Scout rank as a teen – would help him succeed as a councilman.

"I grew up learning how to bring that charity and service to people," he last week.

One of the biggest issues facing the city is development, he said.

"In 30 years, I've seen a lot of change. I've seen it before Trabant was here," he said. "I've seen it build into something where if we keep going in that direction, the city might not be able to support it."

"We don't want to be a metro like Wilmington, and we don't have the space like Middletown," he added.

Barua admitted he doesn't have all the answers but believes the key is for the city to work with the developers to find a balance.

"Change is going to happen," he said. "We're going to get development; that's a given. I'd like to work with developers to get the 100 percent trust of the community."

He is also concerned about the amount of rental properties in his district and believes the zoning code has too many categories.

Along with development is the issue of traffic. Barua said the city should pressure the University of Delaware to limit students' ability to bring cars to Newark, though he admitted that could be difficult considering many students live off campus.

"We need to find balance between who can bring cars and who can't," he said.

He thinks a downtown parking garage could be beneficial but also worries that more parking would lead to more traffic.

"There's no golden answer," he said. "Trying to find a balance is tough."

One of the biggest concerns for voters, he said, is the revitalization of Fairfield Shopping Center. He said he is excited Wooden Wheels Service and Repair is opening there soon, as well as a Food Lion.

"Adding more small businesses would be key in keeping our community united in supporting each other," he said. "I would also like to see about getting a bank back into the shopping center, especially for our senior citizens."

If elected, he would model himself after Councilwoman Jen Wallace.

"She's not go-with-the-flow.

She will say her piece. I do admire that," he said, adding that he also respects councilmen Chris Hamilton and Mark Morehead for their willingness to discuss the "nitty-gritty" details of an issue.

"The more viewpoints you have, the more knowledge and expertise you get on a subject," he said.

Lawhorn aims to bring decorum, respect back to council

By JOSH SHANNON
jshannon@chespub.com

Jason Lawhorn considers himself "an expert problem solver" and believes his managerial skills will help a divided city council become more efficient.

"I've built skills in the industry I think our council can use right now," Lawhorn said.

He is one of three candidates – along with Neel Barua and Lena Thayer – who are vying for the District 5 council seat on Tuesday. The incumbent, Luke Chapman, chose not to seek a fourth term.

Lawhorn, 41, grew up outside Wilmington and graduated from Delcastle High School before enlisting in the United States Navy, where he served four years.

He moved to the Newark area two decades ago, first living in Scottfield and then moving to Fairfield. He now works as research manager for Advanced Materials Technologies in Wilmington.

Lawhorn also serves as vice president of Newark American Little League.

He said the biggest issue facing his district is the revitalization of Fairfield Shopping Center, which has been without an anchor since Superfresh closed. Food Lion is slated to open there, and former employees of Wooden Wheels plan to open a repair shop there. Still, the shopping center is a hot topic among voters, Lawhorn said.

He said he has already talked to Delle Donne and Associates about the shopping center and said communication with developers is key.

"If you have a positive relationship with people, it makes things go more smoothly," he said.

He hopes to bring that attitude to city council, which he said suffers from a "lack of decorum" both between council members and between council and city staff members.

"There seems to be a lack of respect among council members that leads to a lack of efficiency and wasting time," he said.

Citing conversations with current and former city employees, he argued that the way some council members talk to employees has had a negative effect. However, he would not provide examples, explaining he doesn't want to antagonize council members he may soon have to work with.

"A lack of morale has hurt employee retention and productivity in the city," he said.

Lawhorn said he wants to help set a better tone.

"What I can do is use my management experience to communicate with the city staff in a way that treats them as the subject matter experts they are," he said. "That doesn't mean I'll always agree or won't demand excellence of service."

He said one of the most common things he hears when talking to voters is how much they like Newark.

"Everybody loves living here. Everybody loves our services," he said. "That's a true reflection on our staff, and sometimes council forgets that."

He praised Chapman for being "a balance on that council that provided a different voice" but added that communication to District 5 residents needs to improve.

"I want to be the voice for the people and a voice to the people from the city," he said. He plans to use social media, attend community events and hold regular meetings.

Lawhorn hopes to help solve long-simmering debates in Newark, such as the downtown parking issue.

"That's symptomatic of things I've seen in business," he said. "There are lots of good ideas, but because the problems aren't defined, they can never be solved. Solving problems isn't easy; it's a process."

He wants to convene a committee of relevant stakeholders to look at the parking issue and make recommendations to city council. (One such effort is already underway by a subcommittee of the planning commission.)

Lawhorn said he has consid-

Trail, traffic, development among Thayer's priorities

By JOSH SHANNON

jshannon@chespub.com

Lena Thayer spent two years working part-time for the Newark Parks and Recreation Department and now she's looking for a bigger role in the city.

Thayer is one of three newcomers – along with Neel Barua and Jason Lawhorn – who are running in the District 5 city council race. The winner of Tuesday's election will replace Councilman Luke Chapman, who is not seeking a fourth term.

Originally from Massachusetts, Thayer moved to Delaware as a teenager in 1994. She and her husband, Adam Seely, and their four teenagers live in Fairfield.

Thayer, 40, worked part-time for parks and rec from 2005 to 2007. She left for a private-sector job at Hosting.com but recently has been looking for a way to return to public service.

In what she called "cosmic timing," a friend suggested she run for the open council seat just days after she was laid off from her job. She added that she recently completed the Ready to Run program, which trains women to run for elected office.

Thayer said one thing that sets her apart from her opponents is her ability to dedicate most of her time to being a councilwoman. If elected, she plans to at most take a part-time job.

"My family will always be first," she said. "But my time and energy will be dedicated to the Fifth [District] and greater Newark."

Thayer said one of the reasons she is running is she feels District 5 needs a representative who will be more proactive in communicating with residents.

"Some people love Luke," she said. "Others expressed real big concerns about communication."

If elected, Thayer plans to reach out to constituents through newsletters and monthly meetings. She also wants to plan quarterly service projects for residents of District 5 and the broader community.

Thayer said her two years volunteering for the service organization AmeriCorps taught her the effect that community engagement can have on a town. Getting people invested in the community through service means they feel more invested in what happens here, she said.

"It builds better community members," she said.

One of her priorities will be ensuring the progress of a plan to improve a trail that connects Fairfield Crest to the Pomeroy Trail. The work is slated for sometime this year.

"It's definitely a top priority in District 5 to get the connector trail finished," Thayer said.

Another concern among her neighbors is traffic safety, she said. Residents of Corbit Street and surrounding areas are worried about the safety of their neighborhood due to speeders, and out-of-state drivers using neighborhoods like Fairfield as a shortcut also pose problems.

She suggested the city again look at the feasibility of creating a Newark bypass, which she conceded would be a "monumental undertaking," as well as look at ways to better control development.

Thayer said she was encouraged by a recent joint meeting of the city council and planning commission, at which many holistic solutions to development issues were proposed. If elected, she hopes to work with her colleagues on council to further consider and implement some of those recommendations.

With the University of Delaware planning to increase enrollment over the next few years, she recognizes that more development may make sense in areas like Cleveland Avenue, which is already dominated by students. But, she added, the city needs to find a way to encourage developers to build housing that will be affordable and attractive to young professionals, families and seniors, as well.

"We're going to have to grow. That's a fact," Thayer said. "It's how we grow that differentiates us from just being a dorm."

Thayer said there's a lot of division between council members, city staff and the public and she would like to find a way to bridge those gaps.

She also wants the city to look at innovative ways to keep expenses low without sacrificing the city services that set Newark apart from other municipalities.

"There are lots of ways to save cash using technology," Thayer said.

Eastbound Christina Parkway to close for two weekends

POST STAFF REPORT

A major road in Newark will be closed this weekend and next weekend.

Eastbound Christina Parkway

(Route 4) will be closed between Elkton Road and South College Avenue from 7 p.m. Friday through 5 a.m. Monday and again from 7 p.m. April 13 through 5 a.m. April 16 to allow a crew to complete work on the bridges over Christina Creek and the railroad.

Workers will be making repairs to the structures' expansion seals, backwall headers, milling and sealing the bridge approach slabs, according to Louise Holt, a spokeswoman for the Delaware Department of Transportation.

Traffic on Elkton Road will be detoured to Otts Chapel Road and then West Chestnut Hill Road in order to reach South College Avenue.

The closure was originally planned for last month but was delayed due to weather.

Council candidates face off in forums

By JOSH SHANNON

jshannon@chespub.com

The five people running for city council faced off in candidate forums this week.

District 5 candidates Neel Barua, Jason Lawhorn and Lena Thayer spent Monday night answering questions from voters, while District 3 candidates Ricky Nietubicz and Jen Wallace took their turn the following evening. Both events were sponsored by the League of Women Voters and held at the Newark Senior Center.

Attendees sat at tables, and the candidates rotated among the tables, spending 10 minutes at each one answering questions from residents. They then gathered on the stage and answered a few questions in front of the whole group.

District 3

Nietubicz spent four years working for the city of Newark as a city planner, spokesman and administrator of the Downtown Newark Partnership and now works in the private sector. He said those experiences make him well-equipped to be a councilman.

"I think I can lead a fresh look at our zoning code and make sure our continual growth is managed in a way that is optimal for our town and doesn't have the negative impacts we're concerned about," Nietubicz said. "I'll work with our new city manager to look at the organization to make sure we're providing the best possible services at the lowest possible costs."

ed her experience both as a councilwoman and as a community activist. Prior to being elected, she helped lead the group Newark Residents Against the Power Plant.

"Many of you know me from before my time on council, and I think I have a proven track record from before council and on council as being someone that is resident-forward," Wallace said. "You are my boss, and I take my marching orders from residents."

Many of the questions posed Tuesday revolved around development, particularly a proposal to build 44 two-story townhouses on an 8.9-acre wooded lot off West Chestnut Hill Road. Several residents of the surrounding neighborhoods, who have been fighting the project, attended the forum.

"I've been working with the developer and their representatives and asking them to hold a community meeting because I know there are a lot of residents in the area who have concerns," Wallace said.

Nietubicz noted the developer is seeking to annex the property into the city and argued that is a good thing because it means the city, not the county, would have control over land-use decisions.

"The key is working with the developers and engaging the community to make sure whatever development is ultimately done makes sense for the community," he said.

District 5

Barua touted his Eagle Scout rank and record of other community service.

"In my 30 years here in this town, I've done a lot of service and I want to keep doing that service to make Newark the best place we can," he said.

He added that the biggest issues facing the city include development, traffic and parking.

"I don't think I have all the best answers on what's best for the city but I know that I want to listen to all of you," he said. "These are issues where we need community outreach, and I want to be someone that will represent the people the best."

Lawhorn positioned himself as a candidate ready to hit the ground running and noted he has already worked with city and state officials to address traffic issues he heard about while campaigning.

The moderator asked all three candidates if they had ever spoken at a council meeting to voice their concerns on an issue. Lawhorn was the only one who said he had.

He added that while campaigning, he has heard many concerns about development.

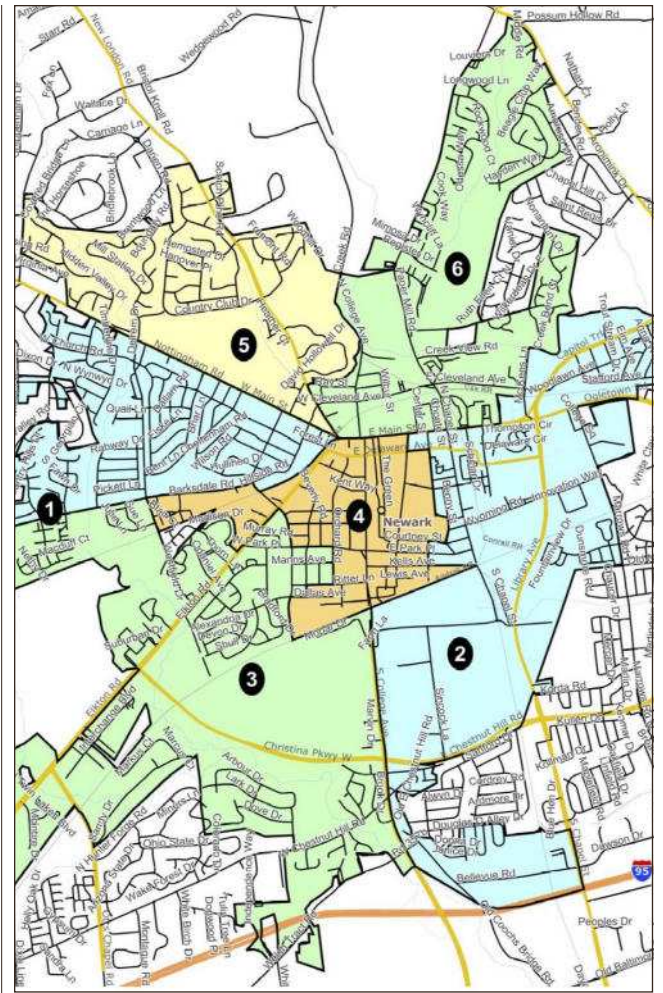

"We understand our city's going to evolve, but it's important we all work together so it evolves in a manner that's in the best interest of the residents and gives the best quality of life to those who choose to live and work here," Lawhorn said.

Thayer said it's important for council members to take advantage of the wealth of knowledge many Newarkers possess, adding that she's heard many great ideas while campaigning.

"What I want to commit to you is to help make those good ideas a reality for our future," Thayer said. "I want to commit to you I will be open and available to you to bring forth your ideas, your thoughts, your concerns. I will do the legwork, I will do the follow up and I will put the time and the availability into this role as it truly needs."

She said she looks forward to diving into the issues facing Newark.

"I don't want to be elected and kick the can down the road," she said. "I want to get things done."

A map shows Newark's election districts. Only districts 3 and 5 have contested races.

District 5 residents will vote at First Presbyterian Church, located at 292 W. Main St. In that district, three newcomers – Neel Barua, Jason Lawhorn and Lena Thayer – are vying to replace Luke Chapman, who chose not to run for a fourth term.

The district is in the northwest portion of Newark and includes Christianstead, West Branch, Fairfield, Fairfield Crest, Terry Manor, most of New London Road and surrounding areas.

District 6 Councilman Stu Markham is unopposed for his seventh term, so no election will be held in that district. The other council seats and the mayor's position are not up for election until next year.

The winners of Tuesday's election will be sworn in for two-year terms on April 19 and won't have much time to get settled before diving in to several high-profile issues.

Likely one of their first major votes will be on whether to authorize a public referendum on borrowing up to $26 million for capital projects, including the planned Rodney stormwater pond and park. The referendum is scheduled for June 19 but won't become official until council authorizes it.

The newly elected council members will also be thrust into the hiring process for the next city manager, which has already dragged on for nearly a year. Applications are being accepted now, and council will begin narrowing down the candidates in May.

Additionally, the budget planning process will start this summer, and council is awaiting recommendations from a committee studying holistic solutions to the downtown parking issue.

investment firm State Street Global Advisers to create the statue in honor of last year’s International Women’s Day. The piece was installed on Wall Street in New York City, with the girl appearing to defiantly stare down the well-known “Charging Bull” statue.

“Fearless Girl” became an overnight sensation, drawing worldwide attention.

“The initial message was to celebrate International Women’s Day and to send a message of inclusion to the male-dominated Wall Street community that women were part of that community and that women are very important to the future of business,” Visbal said, adding, “She’s a symbol of courage that obviously the women’s movement needed.”

Tim Lennon, treasurer of Mid-Atlantic Ballet, said the message of “Fearless Girl” struck a chord with him.

“I was really touched by what it meant,” Lennon said. “I have two girls and I’ve worked with a lot of amazing women.”

On a whim, he contacted Visbal to see if she would be willing to help Mid-Atlantic Ballet, which is located off Elkton Road and recently marked its 20th anniversary in Newark.

To his surprise, Visbal responded. She donated a framed photo of “Fearless Girl” for a fundraiser last year and agreed to attend Saturday’s 5K. She will return June 2 for the ballet studio’s year-end show, which will include a dance number inspired by the statue. In conjunction with the event, the organization will host a poster art contest for local students.

Runners participate in the Fearless 5K.

“It’s really important to work on a grassroots level,” Visbal said. “Mid-Atlantic Ballet is in my backyard. We need to be working with young people to affect a really diverse community.”

Visbal told the crowd Saturday that she has never felt discriminated against because she is a woman but understands there is a disparity between the way men and women are treated.

“We’re all born into this world without any prejudice,” she said. “It’s learned.

We learn it from our teachers, our parents, the community around us. So unlearn the prejudice. Try and open your mind to the people around you.”

Studies have shown men and women’s brains process things differently, and both methods are important, Visbal said.

“Women use a lot more white matter; they can multitask. Men use a lot more gray matter. That means they can jump on a situation and take advantage of an opportunity very quickly,” she said. “We need both to make better decisions. The sooner you understand that, the sooner we evolve as a global community.”

“Fearless Girl” recently marked its one-year anniversary on Wall Street, though there has been talk about moving it and the bull statue to a different location in New York that can accommodate more tourists. Recently, Visbal began selling reproductions of the statue on her website, fearlessgirl.us, to raise money for an educational outreach program she is planning.

Editor's note: Volunteers at the Pencader Heritage Museum have been digitizing old Newark City Council meeting minutes. They share excerpts with Newark Post readers in a weekly column.

January-April 1941: The balance in the town treasury was $7,934.85. Council approved constructing a storm sewer on Kells Avenue and enlarging a waterway on Wilson Street. The storm sewer on Academy Street was not adequate to handle stormwater from university grounds, but no action was taken.

Rittenhouse Motors requested a permit to build a display room and garage on Academy Street, but there was some discussion because of the ordinance against garages in certain parts of town. At the February meeting, the school PTA spoke against the garage, but a citizens' group spoke for it.

Lawson Street was designated one-way eastbound with no parking either side. John Chambers was again turned down for permission to build a liquor store. The town office was told to alternate working Washington's and Lincoln's birthdays. The sanitary sewer would be extended to the Bonham property or Orchard Road.

Eighteen street lights were approved for Elkton Road. Winslow and Sunset Roads were in line for curbs and gutter, and Townsend Road surface would be graveled. Two new Messick dwellings on Courtney Street needed water service. The Board of Health reported unsanitary conditions on Wilson Street, and property owners were given 20 days to rectify the situation.

Fines up to $25 were incurred by owner if a dog running loose bit someone. William Hamilton was forbidden to have a dog run loose on his property after several people had been bitten by his dog. Designated trees would be removed on West Main Street if abutting property owners would put in sidewalks.

Newark Founders Day event to mark city's 260th anniversary

POST STAFF REPORT

It was 260 years ago this month that British King George II granted permission for a weekly market at the site of what is now the Washington House Condominiums, marking the first formal recognition of that town that became Newark.

On Sunday, the Newark Historical Society will celebrate the city's anniversary with its annual Newark Founders Day event, set for 2 to 5 p.m. at the museum, which is located at 429 S. College Ave., in the old Newark Train Station. Free parking is available at Lewis Park, Kells Park and Phillips Park, and limited handicapped spaces are available at the museum.

The event not only celebrates the city's history but also serves as the season opening of the museum. The free museum is closed during the winter, but starting this week, it will be open to the public every Sunday afternoon through November.

The museum will unveil several new exhibits, including one celebrating the 50th anniversary of the Newark Parks and Recreation Department, another looking at life in the 1920s and a display focused on the Newark Arts Alliance. Existing exhibits, such as ones about Newark High School and the University of Delaware, have been revamped.

Sunday's event will include children's activities, raffles, a bluegrass performance by the Ferel Hats and a "living postcard" photo opportunity. The Newark Police Department will give demonstrations, and Aetna Hose Hook and Ladder Company's restored 1926 fire engine will be on display. Food will be available for purchase.

At 2:30 p.m., Mayor Polly Sierer will make a proclamation, and historical society officials will present the organization's annual service award.

Newark High nurse named district nurse of the year

By JESSICA IANNETTA

jiannetta@chespub.com

In her roughly two-decade career with the Christina School District, Newark High School nurse Lori Economos has turned down the nomination for CSD nurse of the year several times.

So this time around, administrators kept the nomination process a secret until they showed up in Economos' office to announce she had won the award. While Economos appreciates the recognition, she's also not a fan of being in the spotlight.

"I don't like attention," Economos said. "We do what we do because we like being nurses and most of us are pretty uncomfortable with the attention piece."

Economos, who holds a bachelor's degree, master's degree and Family Nurse Practitioner License from Wilmington University, started her career with the district in 1998. At first she worked part-time, which Economos said was the perfect fit for her while her kids were young. But eventually, the population at Newark High got bigger and Economos accepted a full-time position there, a job she's now held for the past 16 years.

But while she's been a school nurse for a long time, Economos' favorite part about the job is that she never gets bored. Despite her years of experience, she still sees things she's never seen before, noting "in the medical field, there are always firsts."

Economos also enjoys the daily interactions she has with high school students.

"I like working with adolescents," she said. "They have a good sense of humor and you can joke with them but yet they know if you're serious and you need them to do something."

Sometimes many students don't need medical help so much as they need someone to tell them that everything is going to be OK and that they don't have a serious illness, she said. In the age of social media and WebMD, Economos often finds herself assuring students who are overly anxious or worried about a situation.

But that's not to say that Economos doesn't also deal with some very serious medical issues as a school nurse. In 2012, Economos got a call that a girl had collapsed in a classroom with what the teacher thought was a seizure.

"I started running with my bag, the whole time thinking, 'Don't get too winded before you get there because you need your breath to speak,'" she recalled. "And then when I walked in the room and saw her, it was obvious that her heart had stopped and she wasn't moving."

Economos immediately started CPR and was able to revive the student. Two weeks later, she got to see the student walk at her high school graduation.

"That doesn't happen to most nurses in school nursing. But it was a great outcome for her and great attention for school nursing in general," she said. "It was definitely one of the highlights of my career for sure."

Newark Police cracking down on distracted driving

jshannon@chespub.com

The Newark Police Department is spending this week cracking down on distracted driving.

The department's Traffic Unit and Special Operations Unit is conducting enforcement operations at multiple locations around Newark, Lt. Fred Nelson said.

"Statistically, the primary contributing factors of collisions in Newark continue to be those that frequently result from inattention or last minute operator decisions resulting in a collision," Nelson said.

Many of the officers are focusing on stopping drivers who are talking on a cellphone or not wearing a seatbelt.

Groups of officers set up alongside a road and watch traffic — often using binoculars — for cellphone or seatbelt violations. When they spot an offender, an officer steps out into the road to pull over the driver.

"Additional violations, such as failure to obey a yield sign or various equipment violations are frequently observed and cited as well," Nelson said.

He said 48 percent of collisions in Newark last year were caused by inattentive driving, following too closely or failure to yield.

"Violations such as red lights, stop signs and speed continue to be lesser prevalent causations of collisions by a significant margin," he said.

Newark-area man caught with handgun and pot

By CARL HAMILTON

cahamilton@chespub.com

A Newark-area man was arrested over the weekend after police in Maryland found him with a handgun and marijuana during a traffic stop, according to Cecil County District Court records.

The traffic stop occurred in the northbound lane of Augustine Herman Highway, south of Elkton, about 1 a.m. Saturday, after Deputy Matthew Elliott of the Cecil County Sheriff's Office noticed a Nissan Pathfinder with a non-functioning tag light, police reported.

While talking to the driver, Shymier N. Johnson, 21, the deputy detected "a strong odor of burnt marijuana" coming from inside the vehicle and asked Johnson about the smell, police said.

Johnson denied that there was marijuana inside his vehicle, police added.

After receiving permission from Johnson to search a backpack that had been in the back seat, Elliott found and confiscated a digital scale and four plastic baggies containing approximately 24 grams of marijuana, which is about 4 grams less than an ounce, court records allege.

"Through Elliott's training, knowledge and experience, he recognized the amount and the manner in which the marijuana was packaged was consistent with the intention to distribute," according to court records.

Elliott then seized a Taurus 9mm handgun, which he found under the front passenger's seat, and a magazine holding eight bullets, police said. Elliott also confiscated an ammo box containing 15 more 9mm rounds and a cellphone, police added.

In addition, while performing a pat-down search on Johnson, the deputy found and seized $122 and another cellphone, according to police. The deputy arrested Elliott at the scene.

Johnson is charged with possession of a firearm in the commission of a drug trafficking crime, handgun in vehicle, possession of marijuana with intent to distribute and possession of more than 10 grams of marijuana, court records show.

Johnson was held over the weekend without bond, according to court records. Johnson remained in the Cecil County Detention Center in lieu of a $35,000 bond, records show.

Scammer bilks Newark woman on April Fools' Day

A Newark woman fell victim to a scammer who claimed to be holding her son for ransom, police said.

The woman, a 74-year-old resident of the Woods at Louviers neighborhood, received the call around 4:45 p.m. on Sunday, April 1, according to Lt. Fred Nelson, a spokesman for the Newark Police Department.

The victim told police the caller was screaming for help and then another person got on the line and claimed he had attacked the woman's son for not paying a friend's ransom. The caller demanded the woman send money through gift cards.

The woman complied but later called her son and realized it was a scam, said Nelson, who did not disclose how much money the woman lost.

The incident came shortly after Delaware State Police warned of an increase in virtual kidnapping scams in New Castle County.

"Virtual kidnapping is an extortion scheme that tricks victims into paying a ransom to free a family member they believe is being threatened with violence or death," Master Cpl. Michael Austin said. "Unlike traditional abductions, virtual kidnappers have not actually kidnapped anyone. Instead, through deceptions and threats, they coerce victims to pay a quick ransom."

Austin advised recipients of such calls to hang up and never agree to pay a ransom. Those who believe a real kidnapping has taken place should contact police immediately.

Anyone with information regarding the Newark incident should contact PFC Andrew Vari at AVari@newark.de.us or 302-366-7100, ext 3486.

Louisiana man charged with hate crime in Newark

A Louisiana man slashed a tire during a racially charged argument with a Good Samaritan who had stopped to help the defendant's friend in a Newark parking lot, police said.

The incident happened around 11 p.m. Monday outside the Exxon gas station on South College Avenue, according to Lt. Fred Nelson, a spokesman for the Newark Police Department.

The defendant was identified as Christopher H. Thornton, 45, of Belle Chase, La.

Nelson said a female friend of Thornton asked the victim for help jumping her car, and the victim, a 20-year-old black man, agreed to assist.

While the victim was helping, Thornton began using racial slurs toward him and the two men began to argue, Nelson said. The victim went inside the Exxon and when he returned, he found that his rear tire had been slashed.

Police searched the car Thornton was in and found the knife they believe he used to slash the tire.

The victim did not know Thornton or the woman, Nelson said.

Thornton was charged with a hate crime and criminal mischief. He was committed to Howard R. Young Correctional Institution in lieu of $1,500 cash bond.

Spring sports should be fun

Jon Buzby

Spring is here – finally!

At least it's here on the calendar, and slowly but surely soon to be on the thermometer.

Of the three sports seasons, this always seems to be the most welcome one.

After months cooped up inside followed by, at least this year, a few straight weeks in March shoveling snow, it's refreshing to be sitting outside on the bleachers watching our kids practice and play youth sports. Even if we are still wearing a stocking cap.

Whether it's T-ball, travel soccer, recreation softball, varsity tennis or any other of the springtime sports, parents seem to enjoy being spectators more than any other season. Not because we don't like watching our kids play in the fall or winter, but simply because everyone is happy to be outside again.

It's the perfect opportunity for all of us parents – my sons are playing soccer and lacrosse – to remember the true reason why our kids play sports.

One reason is for the sport of it. For some, that means playing a sport for the very first time and learning the new skills and team strategies that go along with it. For others, it's getting back on the field or court and improving previously learned skills while playing against a different level of competition than the year before.

There also is a social part, for the kids and parents. It's a chance to meet new friends, reunite with old ones and create memories at practices, during games and at social activities held in between. If you think about it, many of the friendships you have now were probably started in the bleachers or while sitting in sports chairs watching your kids play. It might be the second best outcome of playing youth sports.

The best outcome? That's easy – kids having fun.

Sometimes we overlook this aspect of amateur sports. Not intentionally, but maybe just because it's sometimes hard to use the term "fun" after a loss. And at the varsity level, sometimes there's more on the line than just championships, like college scholarships.

But the bottom line is that we parents need to approach sports with a fun attitude. Because if we don't seem like we're having fun, that attitude can be quickly picked up by our children, win or lose.

I tell my boys the same thing before every game: Play hard, play smart and have fun. And I mean it.

Do I want them to win? Absolutely. I know as a former player and now as a volunteer coach that wins come more often when teams play smart and play hard. But the number one thing I want for my boys to say after a game, or a practice for that matter, is that they had fun. Because if they aren't having fun, they're not going to want to play again. And if they don't play again, they'll miss out on all the benefits of playing sports.

So as spring break comes to a close, the weather gets even nicer, and the spring sports seasons really ramp up, let's all try to remember the true purpose of sports.

Before a practice or game, it's OK to remind your kids to play smart and play hard. However, the most important message you can relay to them is to "have fun."

And then, it's up to us parents to practice what we preach and focus on the fun parts of the game, not the wins or losses or the individual stats.

Spring is here, and the fun is just beginning.

Out of the Attic

Blue Hen Lanes construction – 1960

This week's Out of the Attic item is an August 1960 Newark Post photo of workers building the Blue Hen Lanes bowling alley in Newark Shopping Center.

An accompanying article described the bowling alley as "a mecca for area bowlers, with design features and equipment matched by few if any bowling establishments in Delaware." The bowling alley was open 24 hours a day and boasted 32 bowling lanes, a coffee shop, a children's nursery and a lounge.

The facility marked its opening with a gala event Sept. 19, 1960, featuring free bowling for all attendees, a ribbon cutting by local dignitaries and several presentations. The Newark Post reported that Blue Hen Lanes presented "a full-grown chicken with blue-tinted feathers" to Linda Handloff, the daughter of shopping center owner Jack Handloff. "Her mother graciously declined the gift," the newspaper reported.

Blue Hen Lanes closed in May 2014 and was replaced by the One Easton apartment complex.

Out of the Attic is produced in partnership with the Newark Historical Society. The Newark History Museum, located in the old train station under the South College Avenue overpass, is open Sundays from 2 to 5 p.m. For more info, visit www.newarkdehistoricalsociety.org.
