

Administration

Today's college student is a more interesting and complex person than his counterpart of a generation or two ago. He has been better taught and is more widely read, better informed, and more aware of cultures other than his own. He has had more opportunities to make his own decisions and to establish and test his own set of values. He is simultaneously more idealistic and more pragmatic than the student of earlier generations. He is more concerned about contemporary problems than was his father. He has a greater opportunity to participate in the political, social, and educational developments of society.

With these advantages, today's student must realize that with greater opportunities and capabilities come greater responsibilities. He has the responsibility not to respond from doctrinaire positions or fixed solutions to the complex problems he and his generation must face.

In brief, every college student today has an opportunity and an obligation to be a Renaissance man—of the twentieth century Renaissance.
